Making a Difference through Grantmaking in Child & Family Well-being

Candidates for Child & Family Well-being Grants

Child and Family Well-Being works through accredited organizations and other nonprofit groups in North Carolina and South Carolina. The two areas of work are:

Prevention and early intervention for at-risk children focuses on replicating evidence-based programs, such as Incredible Years or Trauma-Focused Cognitive Behavioral Therapy, and building North Carolina and South Carolina's capacity to implement evidence-based models.

Out-of-home care strives to help the child welfare system improve well-being through better assessment and the exclusive use of high quality providers that offer a range of services during and after care.

In Darlington County, South Carolina, grants are supporting a community-wide project focused on reducing teen pregnancy. Partners include the county public school system, local clinics and hospitals, and grassroots organizations. With efforts focused on school-based education, clinic access to contraceptive care and community-led interventions, the goal is to give young people resources for healthy choices.

In Catawba County, North Carolina, a project ensures children exiting foster care receive necessary supports and case management. Funding is helping this Success Coach model expand into six additional counties as part of a randomized control trial.

Philanthropic Approach

The Child and Family Well-Being program area views its grantmaking approach as advancing and supporting change as a collaborating partner with public agencies and private organizations to prevent, treat and mitigate the effects of child maltreatment and improve child well-being outcomes.

Departments of social services work tirelessly to find permanent placements for children, whether through adoption or family reunification. Catawba County, North Carolina, piloted a project that ensures children exiting foster care receive necessary supports and case management. Funding is helping this Success Coach model expand into six additional counties as part of a randomized control trial.
